

“India: The Every Worker and The People Mover”

- Little by little, it is becoming clear that two things are of paramount importance here.
!st, there is always more work to be done—any task is a possible job. Be it your rickshaw driver swiftly stealing you away to his friend’s shop for a small commission, you don’t need to buy, just show up, trash being sorted from between rail lines, or the person collecting other people for the shared taxi ride from the airport. There is a woman whose singular job is to shush away pigeons from the swimming pool’s edge. Often stores are over-employed. You might find yourself being helped by 5 or 6 waiters at a restaurant or followed keenly by 2 or 3 people at a retail shop. And of course the streets are filled with children selling anything they can get their hands on and at any price.
2nd, India needs to move people. That is the bottom line. People are shoving to the front of every line and filling the seats of every train. Furthermore, there is a low enough price for any traveler and a high enough price for any quality. If you are getting a deal on transport, you are likely to be sharing your ride and will have to wait until each seat by you is filled.
how does a country deal with so many people?
